Other Official RAR Repacks Links: Biomarker responses to nanoparticle surface modification in aquatic organisms. As nanotechnology is continuously developed and applied in our daily life, the toxic potential of engineered nanoparticles (ENPs) is becoming a major concern for their environmental impact.

However, most of the studies on ENP effects on organisms have focused only on their physical, chemical, and biological properties. The other potential influences, such as the surface modification of ENPs and the alterations to the cell membranes of organisms, are not being considered. The aquatic organisms can be directly exposed to ENPs in the environments, and the cell membranes of organisms may also be affected during the exposure. In this study, two types of ENPs, polystyrene (PS) ENPs and oleate-stabilized gold nanoparticles (Au ENPs), were chosen for surface modification. The colloidal stability, surface characteristics, membrane integrity, and metabolic activity of Chlorella pyrenoidosa and Chlorella vulgaris were investigated using different surface modifications of PS ENPs and Au ENPs. The results indicated that the colloidal stability of the PS ENPs and Au ENPs decreased and the surface properties changed after modification. The cell membrane integrity and the metabolic activity of C. pyrenoidosa and C. vulgaris were not affected by the presence of surface-modified ENPs. These results were beneficial for understanding the sub-lethal effects of ENPs in the aquatic organisms and developing toxicity assays. From Goldfield, Nevada, James Addison Reaney entered the world at 8:15 pm on March 25th, 1908. His life would become one of America's most historic and influential political careers. He spent most of his life in the service of his country, providing leadership and insight during the most momentous time in our nation's history. When Reaney was born, Nevada was less than a decade old and the West was a place of lawlessness. But in this difficult time, Reaney's father, Woodie, quickly became one of Nevada's most influential attorneys. The family law firm in downtown Reno, Reaney 82157476af
